

Gateway to University Honors

Professor Neil Choudhury

Experience Documentation

Due 11/26/14

Claire James

HNRS1010 Documentation

As the semester comes to the close, it's time to do what the Honors Program loves most: reflect. It certainly has been a rollercoaster ride, but I've learned so much, especially in Gateway to Honors. While Gateway to Honors was not what I considered to be a very challenging academic course, it really did challenge me in ways I did not expect.

In HNRS1010, we did various activities, ranging from talking about our passions to writing mock proposals for imaginary honors experiences. It took place in Swift Hall, room 809, and involved about 25 other freshman honors students, and our professor, Mr. Neil Choudhury. Once a week for 14 weeks, I would attend this class and peel back layers, learning a little more about myself. I didn't expect that at all. That was the best part of this course, in all honesty. Having to verbalize things I already knew about myself gave me the opportunity to reflect. The experience allows me to take my newfound reflections and put them to use in the future, in order to pursue things that will make me happy in life.